EXOME PANEL TESTING DESCRIPTION

The genes in each panel are sequenced as part of the sequence of an entire exome. For each gene in the designated panel all coding nucleotides are sequenced in at least 20 different fragments (20x coverage) or the fragment is sequenced by Sanger methodology. We have chosen this approach to sequence all known candidate genes. If no mutations are identified, then examination of the entire exome is available by re-analysis of the sequence (request Reflex to Exome Sequencing) without additional laboratory work.
During panel test analysis and interpretation, variants detected in other genes, even those in those deemed "medically actionable" by the ACMG guidelines, are not examined but can be provided when Reflex to Exome Sequencing is requested. The Reflex study is completed on request with appropriate consent from the patient/family. Clinicians are encouraged to translate these limitations of panel testing by exome to the patient and to contact the NCGL laboratory directors with any related questions.

RESEARCH POLICIES & OPPORTUNITIES

Blood or other samples sent to the Northwest Clinical Genomics Laboratory (NCGL) may be used by UW Medicine, by medical organizations affiliated with UW Medicine, or by educational or business organizations approved by UW Medicine, for research, education and other activities that support UW Medicine's mission, without your/your child's specific consent. Other types of research performed in association with the NCGL require that we obtain consent from the patient (below).

PATIENTS – Please check off and initial below whether we can contact you to let you know about research studies requiring consent in which you/your child may be able to participate. These research studies may include: 1) a request for additional clinical records about your condition, 2) studies to find new causes for your condition, and 3) studies to evaluate newly developed treatments for your condition.
